Studying the Loxahatchee

Floating down the northwest fork of the Loxahatchee River is an exhilarating experience you won't soon forget. Sunlight filters through the cathedral-like canopy of cypress trees, falling on the tea-colored water as your canoe negotiates the tight bends in the river. Here, Jim Rousseau, Outdoor Recreation Planner for the National Park Service, and Bob Bergen, an instructor at Pine Jog Environmental Sciences Center float the river as part of a National Wild and Scenic Rivers study. Story, A3.
